Historical Note

A pioneer group of five Sisters of St. Joseph departed Rochester in September 1940 to assist the Fathers of St. Edmund in their work among African Americans in Selma. At a time of severe segregation when many Black families lived in dire poverty, the Sisters began offering outreach and education at St. Elizabeth's Parish, where they opened an elementary school. In 1943, they collaborated with the Edmundites to open Holy Infant Inn, a nursing home for Blacks. In 1944, they agreed to staff Good Samaritan Hospital, the only health care facility in the region that would accept Black patients. A few years later, the Sisters organized a school of practical nursing, the only vocational education opportunity for Black students in Alabama.

During the momentous civil rights era of the 1960s, the Sisters of St. Joseph played a significant role of support in Selma. Marchers demonstrating for voting rights who were beaten by state troopers on Bloody Sunday (March 7, 1965) received care at Good Samaritan Hospital, and the Sisters provided shelter to clergy and women religious from around the country who joined in the demonstrations that followed Bloody Sunday. Praising the staff of Good Samaritan on the Senate floor that month, Senator Thomas Dodd noted that "they have been, until just a few days ago, the only white group in Selma to take a stand on the civil rights demonstrations."

Beginning in the 1970s, the Sisters moved out into rural areas including Pine Apple and Vredenburgh to open a health clinic and a learning center and to connect underserved residents with social services. The SSJ ministry in Alabama continues today with outreach and assistance to families in the Selma region. More than one hundred Sisters of St. Joseph of Rochester have served in Alabama since 1940.

Scope and Contents

The Alabama Collection documents the ministry of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Rochester in Alabama, principally Selma, from 1940 to the present. Areas of focus include the founding of the SSJ Alabama mission, St. Elizabeth's School, Good Samaritan Hospital, and Good Samaritan Hospital School of Nursing. The Sisters' work in later years (1970s-present) at Our Lady Queen of Peace Parish and in the rural areas of Pine Apple and Vredenburgh is also documented.

Of particular interest are materials covering the civil rights era of the 1960s, notably the role the Sisters played in caring for demonstrators beaten by state troopers on Bloody Sunday. Among those who received care at Good Samaritan Hospital was John Lewis (at that time chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee and later US Congressman from Georgia). He often acknowledged the Sisters for saving his life that day and visited the Motherhouse in Rochester to thank them in 2016. In addition, the Sisters provided food and lodging to clergy and women religious who came from many parts of the country to Selma after Bloody Sunday to join Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in the voting rights demonstrations. Correspondence, newspaper clippings (many from the Selma press), first-person accounts, and other records shed light on these historic events.

Audio-visual materials include oral history interviews conducted with Sisters who served in Alabama and master DVDs of some of the original source video from Sisters of Selma: Bearing Witness to Change, a documentary film about the women religious who took part in the march from Selma to Montgomery (Hartfilms, 2006). The role of the Sisters of St. Joseph who lived and worked in Selma in 1965 is included in the film; the master DVDs contain footage of Rochester SSJs who were interviewed in 2003.

The collection includes hundreds of photographs from the 1940s to the present depicting the Sisters and their ministries; events and activities at St. Elizabeth's Parish, Good Samaritan Hospital, and the nursing school; Selma and environs.
